

Like so many Americans who have submitted comments in this docket, I, too, oppose any move to allow increased consolidation among media outlets, be they broadcast, cable or newspaper companies. It is simply not true that consolidation leads to diversity: quite the opposite. For example, one only need look at the usual fare of the broadcast networks to realize that increasingly news reporting has become nothing but cross-marketing for other "programming." Only public television and radio provide a consistent forum for quality discussion of public affairs in this country, and these locally controlled outlets (the only ones in some communities) are experiencing increasing financial pressure for other reasons. For the conservatives on the Commission, I urge you to read Safire's column in the New York Times on this issue. You will find that it is you who are out of step with the conservative ethos of your colleagues, for true conservatives oppose the concentration of power in any form. For the liberals on the Commission, you are right to worry that allowing media consolidation surely abdicates the Commission's responsibility to manage this precious resource in the public interest. I urge the Commission to oppose further media consolidation.
